Teaching Philosophy

As a language teacher, I strongly believe in:

- The essence of foreign language education is nurturing a mind that understands and appreciates different perspectives, versed in effective communication in different cultural settings, and can work cooperatively with people across borders.

- A good teacher should be teaching to the students’ needs and to the current world context: to teach students to think globally.

- Technology enhances teaching and learning if used effectively.

- A good teacher needs to be able to incorporate all different strategies into teaching and embrace all modes of effective activities, not just limited to one school or one style.

- Cooperative learning and project-based learning create an environment for students to be creative, to think critically and to learn to work with others.

- It is important to teach language in culture and in current context. Language comes from life and should be taught using as many real-life examples as possible.

- A teacher can always teach better. Teaching is a profession that allows one to reflect him or herself through daily practices with students and collaboration with co-workers.
